

Appointed by the State Board of Agriculture, Dr. Robert Stout has served as the Kentucky

State Veterinarian and Division of Animal Health executive director for seven years. Regulating the health of Kentucky's animals ranging from horses to honeybees, and just about everything in between, the Division of Animal Health and the approximately 30 inspectors and five law enforcement investigators in the division have a big job. They ensure Kentucky remains a place where commerce and recreation using animals is safe and thriving. The investigators within the division are a widely unknown group of individuals who enforce laws that are mostly unknown to Kentucky citizens.

But, the jobs they perform pose challenges and provide a unique and important service to the commonwealth. >>
